it was customary for children learning to do fancy work to prepare for exhibition a piece of material on which they had embroidered specimens of their skill in needlework. Each piece prepared for the exhibition was called a "sampler." The stitches and brilliant colors employed in the making of the samplers were of such good character that they have withstood the changes that time has made in needlework, and are today revived and applied to everything but samplers, the latter no longer being required of patient little fingers.
